

Top 3 Tips on What To Do If You've Contracted Legionnaires' Disease

The shock of a Legionnaires' disease diagnosis can be overwhelming. Suddenly, you're facing serious health concerns, mounting medical bills, and a sense of confusion about what to do next. While your health is the top priority, taking swift legal action can be crucial in protecting your rights and securing the compensation you deserve.

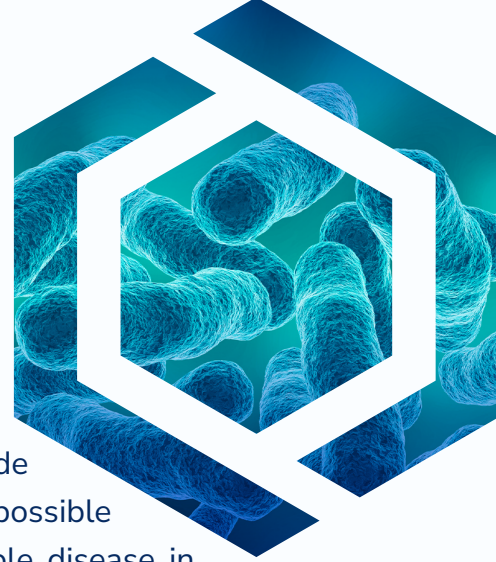

That's where I come in. I'm Johnny Denenea, The Legionnaires' Lawyer, and for over two decades, I've been helping people across the nation navigate the legal complexities of this devastating disease.

This guide will outline three critical steps you should take immediately following a diagnosis to protect your rights and build a strong foundation for your case.

Contact the local or State Department of Health

Report that your loved one has been diagnosed with Legionnaires' Disease by calling the health department immediately. You can usually find the contact information for your state's health department on their website. Provide your loved one's name, date of birth, diagnosis date, and possible exposure location(s). Legionnaires' Disease is a reportable disease in every jurisdiction, and the only way to prevent a second exposure is to notify the authorities and have it recorded.

Determine the Likely Source and Have it Tested

Potential sources include cooling towers, hot tubs, decorative fountains, and plumbing systems. Think about places your loved one visited in the weeks before their illness, such as hotels, hospitals, or public buildings. Not every state and local health department requires a test of the location, or an investigation. Most states only test and investigate where there are two or more exposures. If the authority will not test, then do your own test. (We can help!)

Contact an Experienced Legionnaires' Attorney

Of the most recent cases that have contacted me, almost all of them needed some basic direction or a couple of questions answered. Although I may not handle their case, the discussion about what may be expected in the process provides some benefit while they have been under severe stress trying to attend to their very sick loved one. If there is some immediate action necessary to make a claim or file a lawsuit, a knowledgeable Legionnaires' attorney can do it.
